

YOU TOLD ME SO

W. Volyar

You told me I wouldn't be happy

You told me all of my tears wouldn't be worth it in the end

I carved away each part of me, knowing I wouldn't like the result

I unearthed a new layer each time, turning into something I knew I wasn't meant to be

You told me so

You told me it wasn't worth it

You told me he wasn't worth it

I didn't believe you for some damned reason

I didn't believe what we had was love

I thought love was supposed to make people deranged and desperate

But ours only made me feel soft and sugary

So, I sold my life away

I sold it away to someone who just saw me as their wife, nothing more

You told me so

You told me so, yet I wouldn't listen

You told me so, but I continued to distract myself with meaningless nights

You told me so many things yet I was still oblivious to truth

So now I stand, alone in the field where we first met

Where our hearts first melted into one

I come here everyday, hoping that you would appear again and hold me close

Maybe then I would've never let go

I should've never let myself leave those parts behind

I should have listened to you

But I didn't,

So now I sit here, thinking about how you told me so.

